

THE IMPOSSIBLE COLLECTION

In the end of February 2010, The Impossible Project supplied several carefully selected photographers and artists worldwide with the very first batch of Impossible's new Instant Film material. They were invited to find out what their talent and creativity can do with the first sample of Impossible's new Instant Film, to discover its secrets, to push it over all limits and to thereby show what is possible.

The photo material herewith proudly presented is not only stunning in its unique beauty and creativity, but it furthermore contains an historic significance. Not only was it taken on the very first film materials leaving the factory of The Impossible Project, but it also is the foundation of The Impossible Collection - a growing archive of contemporary Instant Photography artworks. Referring to the famous Polaroid Collections founded in the 1960s by Edwin Land, The Impossible Collection aims to serve two essential goals:

1. To continuously develop the new Impossible film materials. Upon the results and feedback of all contributing photographers, the production team will constantly adapt and fine-tune the Impossible film materials.
2. The images of The Impossible Collection will - better than any words can ever do - show the world the new magic, the fresh flavor and taste as well as the astonishing potential of the new film materials. The Impossible Collection aims to collect and present a unique portfolio featuring the most interesting analog photographic works of contemporary photographers and artists.

So far the following artists provided their work and carefully interpreted the new Impossible Film Materials, building the base of The Impossible Collection:
